PREPARED BY AND FOR THE EMPLOYEES OF WALT DISNEY WORLD

AUGUST 20, 1976

MODERN TECHNOLOGY MADE RUSTIC

If it were not for the paved roads meandering through the towering cypress trees, the electric street lamps casting their glow in the evening's quiet, or the gleaming aluminum-sided recreational vehicles spouting their C.B. antennas in the shaded camping loops, our Fort Wilderness Campgrounds might look as a real turn-of-the-century wilderness settlement did.

Massive hand-hewn logs from the Western Rockies make up the sides of Pioneer Hall, the Wilderness Outpost, and other support buildings; youngsters sitting astride saddled horses clomp past on their way into nearby forests; cast iron skillets and pots are on sale in the Trading Post; and everywhere is the mixed smell of deep forests, flowers, and cooking fires.

But beneath our rustic flavorings, our total theming of every detail possible; is a modern resort, pulsating with underground electric power lines, telephone cables, two-way radio communications systems, and computer terminals. Fort Wilderness is every bit as current in its operational technologies as our futuristic Contemporary Resort. Fort Wilderness is modern technology made rustic.

And when you think back to the days of Davy Crockett where camping was not an adventure, but a way of life, what could be more turn-of-the-century than a ride on a steam train and a dip in the ol' swimming hole? So we asked two of our writers to visit

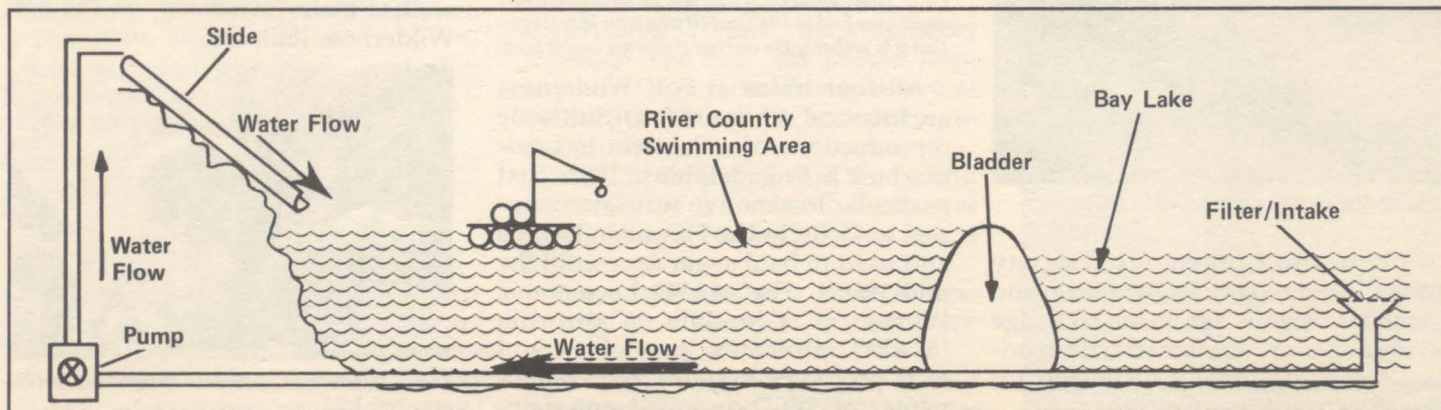

River Country and the Fort Wilderness Railroad to see how our modern technologies have been applied to these old fashioned means of recreation and transportation.

FLORIDA'S SECOND MOUNTAIN

First came Space Mountain, a towering massive structure sitting on the edge of Tomorrowland. Then came a different type of mountain, a mountain that looks like a mountain; complete with exposed rock faces, trees, and flowers. And winding down and around are log flume-type troughs, a raging white-water river, and cascading water falls. Florida's second mountain is River Country, a "mountain" of fun, 1800's style!

Even as the water attraction was taking shape on the drawing boards, one major problem was facing the architects that only modern technology could solve . . . how do you keep the water in a sheltered cove fresh? How do you keep it from stagnating?

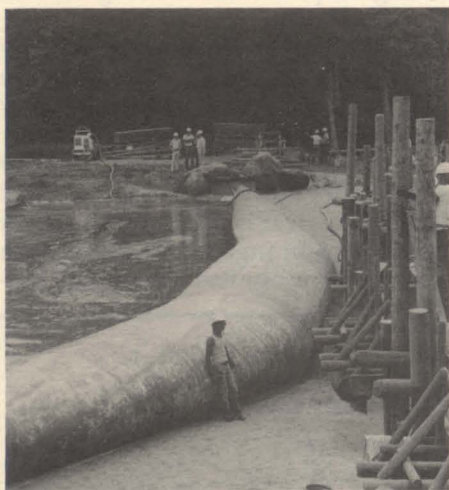

Dave Jaskiewicz, Supervisor of Recreation at Fort Wilderness, explained that the answer is relatively simple, if not just plain ingenious! The diagram explains how our water exchange system works: Since the over one-million gallons of water in River Country's cove is part of Bay Lake, some system of circulating it was needed. Modern high-speed pumps would not be effective, so another system was sought. The solution is as old as nature itself; gravity.

An intake pipe was extended far out into Bay Lake. Water is sucked in its mouth and rushes along across the lake's bottom and under the cove until it reaches pumps located in the base of the mountain which shoulders the two flumes and raft ride. The pumps force the water upwards until it breaks open into the troughs, where it plummets downwards at the rate of 8,500 gallons per minute, carrying guests on an exciting ride.

At the mouth of the cove, separating it from the rest of Bay Lake, is the secret to the entire system . . . a rubber bladder. The bladder is a long sausage-looking tube, stretching across the mouth of the cove. Hidden alongside is a sensory device which operates a pump and drainage system. The pump inflates the bladder with lake water until it begins to blow up like a balloon. Soon, its top rises above Bay Lake's surface until there is a six inch difference. And there it remains, the bladder inflating and deflating automatically, keeping approximately six inches difference. With 8,500 gallons of water per minute entering the cove from the flumes and slides, soon the cove is spilling over the top of the bladder at that same rate.

The bladder during construction.

Simple, but ingenious. Gravity forces water to seek its own level and provides us with our water exchange system. Nature combined with modern technology make rustic fun for our guests at River Country.

STEAM, NOT GASOLINE . . .

Vern Conner, Qualified Trainer on the Steam Trains and EYES & EARS Area Reporter for Fort Wilderness, takes a look at another example of modern technology made rustic, the Fort Wilderness Railroad.

Since its opening earlier this summer, Walt Disney World's newest attraction, River Country, has been playing to capacity crowds. And the vast majority of its guests come in through the main entrance of Fort Wilderness.

You first park in the Campground Day Visitor parking lot, purchase your River Country ticket at a nearby booth, and board the Fort Wilderness Railroad for the two-mile journey to our aquatic adventure. For many guests, this is their first look at Fort Wilderness and they are given a scenic tour of the campground from the cars of an authentic steam train.

The Fort Wilderness Railroad has been expanded greatly to meet the needs of our guests. Today, we have four trains; each made up of five passenger cars and a steam-powered engine. Frequently all four are traveling the tracks at once, to minimize the wait time.

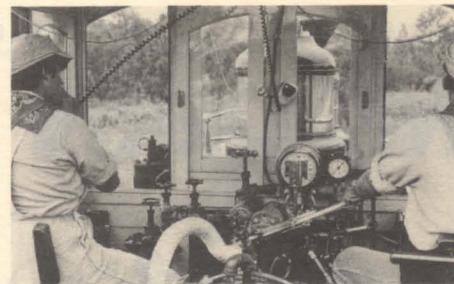

Article author Vern Conner's father took this photo when he was stationed at what is today Hickam Air Force Base, Honolulu, Hawaii. It was taken in a sugar cane field in 1942 and all who have seen it agree that it is probably the one our trains are copied from.

All four trains at Fort Wilderness are identical. They are four-fifth scale reproductions of a Baldwin locomotive built in Philadelphia in 1882. That particular locomotive was later shipped to Oahu in the Hawaiian Islands and used to haul sugar cane until the mid-1960's. The MAPO Locomotive Works of Glendale, California (MAPO fabricates, assembles and tests prototype systems and components for WED-designed entertainment attractions) then made four replicas of the train for use in Fort Wilderness. Our steam trains began operating in the summer of 1973.

Each train has a capacity of 90 passengers (as opposed to 375 per train in the Magic Kingdom) and because the tracks run through guest camping areas, speeds are kept to no more than 10 miles per hour. There are three and one-half miles of track in the campgrounds and a complete round-trip takes nearly 30 minutes.

A steam locomotive is no easy vehicle to operate. The fireman on the left controls the water pressure through a series of valves and gages, while the engineer on the right operates the forward motion of the engine and controls the boiler heat.

At the Gateway Depot, the entrance to Fort Wilderness, the stationmaster checks your ticket while the fireman can be seen filling the engine's saddle tank from the water tower. A blast on the whistle from the engineer, a powerful hiss of steam, and you're off for River Country.

Each train actually operates on live steam. However, through modern technology, a wood-fed fire is no longer needed to heat the water in the boiler. Each engine carries a tank of diesel fuel to stoke its fire. And each train requires two operators in the cab; an engineer on the right and a fireman on the left. All of Fort Wilderness' steam train operators are qualified in each job and undergo nearly two-weeks of intense training before being considered proficient. Finally, to dispel any rumors arising from terms such as "fireman" and "stationmaster," there are female as well as male "steamers" on the Fort Wilderness Railroad.

Diana Middlebrook, a fireman (fireperson?) on Engine No. 3.

HOW A STEAM TRAIN OPERATES

There are two main steps in moving eighteen tons of narrow gauge steam train around Fort Wilderness . . . making steam and putting that steam to work.

Inside the cabin, between the engineer and fireman, is the firebox (1) where diesel fuel is drawn from a holding tank and sprayed (2) to feed a fire which produces intense heat. This heat is carried through a series of pipes called "flues" (3) to the smoke stack (4). The heat is drawn through the flues by a partial vacuum created by a blower (5) in the smokebox (6) located at the front of the engine.

The flues are surrounded by 150 gallons of water (7) which the heat flowing through them turns into steam. The steam collects just above the water's surface in the steam dome (8). The fireman controls the amount of water in the boiler while the engineer controls the heat of the fire.

Once 150 pounds per square inch of steam pressure has been reached, the engineer pulls back the throttle (9) which opens the dry pipe (10) located inside the steam dome. The dry pipe is an escape route for the building steam pressure in the steam dome and it goes forward through the pipe to the front of the engine where it enters the cylinders (11). Once in the cylinders, the steam goes through a series of channels in the steam chest (12) above them, pushing pistons (13) back and forth. The pistons are connected to the drive wheels (14) by a Stevenson Gear (15) and when the pistons move, so do the wheels . . . and the rest of the train follows.

CUSTODIAL "SWEEPS" SOFTBALL WORLD SERIES

Custodial and Theme Park Maintenance hooked up in the 2nd Annual World "World Series" last week, and when the dust settled, Custodial came out on top after sweeping three straight games from Theme Park Maintenance by the final scores of 10-6, 10-1, and 7-6.

All three contests were marked by timely hitting, solid fielding, and at times some very remarkable playing on the part of both teams! But in the end, Custodial's solid lineup, both offensively and defensively, made the difference . . . a fact that most tournament observers agreed on. Trophies were presented to both teams, and thus ended another long and fun-filled championship season of Walt Disney World softball.

CENTER TAKES SUMMER BASKETBALL CHAMPIONSHIP

The Center, one of 16 teams participating in our Walt Disney World Summer Basketball League, won the championship this past Wednesday night, defeating the previously undefeated Contemporary Supers in the final game by a margin of only two points! Eight teams competed in the three-day single elimination tournament held at Edgewater High School gym.

In the quarter-final round, the Contemporary Supers ran to a win over Transportation 71-62, Entertainment climbed Space Mountain 79-61, the Zoo Crew clawed Reedy Creek 73-62, and The Center outpointed Liberty Tree Tavern 66-45.

In the semi-finals, the Contemporary Supers just got by a tough and driving Entertainment team 51-50, and the Zoo Crew put on a fine show, with The Center just edging by in a 64-61 verdict.

On the last night, the same brand of game ball was evident as the score changed hands by the minute, with the underdog Center team hanging in for a 67-65 win in what spectators agreed was one of the best basketball tournament ever staged at Walt Disney World.

Thanks go out to all competitors for their cooperation and assistance during the summer season!

IMPORTANT NOTICE TO ALL EMPLOYEES

On July 1, 1976, all Walt Disney cast members who had previously refused our Pension Plan or had never completed a Pension Plan form, were sent an Open Enrollment Pension Plan form to complete. The form, green in color, is important to you if you want to now take advantage of our Pension Plan.

Personnel Services wishes to remind you that they must receive these forms back to their office within the next few weeks indicating whether or not you desire the Pension Plan. Should you elect to join the Plan, then complete the form. If not, then sign your name and return it. Your attention in this matter will be greatly appreciated by the Personnel Services office. For more information, call extensions 4732 or 4742.
